PROGRAM 1.12.1

The output of program is:

Enter Name: Ravinder

Enter age:30

Name:Ravinder

Age: 30

The program define person as a new data of type class. The class person includes two basic data type items and two function to operate on that data. These functions are called member function. The main program uses person to declare variables of its type. As pointed out earlier, class variables are known as objects. Here, p is an object of type person. Class object are used to invoke the function defined in that class.

1.13 Structure of C++ Program

As it can be seen from program 1.12.1, a typical C++ program would contain four sections as shown in fig. 1.9. This section may be placed in separate code files and then compiled independently or jointly.

It is a common practice to organize a program into three separate files. The class declarations are placed in a header file and the definitions of member functions go into another file. This approach enables the programmer to separate the abstract specification of the interface from the implementation details (member function definition).

Finally, the main program that uses the class is places in a third file which “includes: the previous two files as well as any other file required.
